Overview

Will China's Rep exports replace domestic R&D efforts in energy storage?

This indicates that, in the short run, China's REP exports will replace domestic RE R&D efforts and thus reduce related R&D in energy storage technologies. In the long run, however, these exports complement R&D activities, inducing further innovation in energy storage.

Can technology imports accelerate energy innovation and technology diffusion?

Technology imports and research and development (R&D) can be critical for accelerating energy innovation and technology diffusion (Chen et al., 2024a). Therefore, in order to accelerate ET, countries need either to invest in R&D or import RE technologies.

Do China's Rep exports stimulate long-term R&D activities in host countries?

This indicates that China's REP exports stimulate long-term R&D activities in host countries. This result aligns with previous studies, such as Chen et al. (2024b), and can be attributed to host countries' increased investment in domestic R&D to absorb and integrate imported technologies effectively.

Do technology imports affect domestic R&D activities?

Existing studies highlight that technology imports influence domestic R&D activities through both substitution and complementarity effects (Aggarwal, 2000). The substitution effect suggests that technology imports may displace domestic R&D efforts, thereby diminishing a country's innovation capacities.
